FEDERAL AGENCIES..... 69

AGENCY WEBSITES..... 70

INTRODUCTION

Communication continues to be an important discussion topic along the U.S.-Mexico border, as elsewhere in the U.S. Specific issues include the exchange of data (environmental and epidemiological), as well as daily information and events in the realm of environmental health. Various methods of communicating these concerns continue to be discussed and investigated. Several potential models include the electronic dissemination of necessary information to the appropriate people, while others focus upon the fax machine to distribute information. These discussions highlight the importance of knowing who to contact no matter which communications model is used.

The Environmental Health Yellow Pages helps users identify the appropriate agency with jurisdiction over a particular environmental media or environmental health issue in the U.S.-Mexico border region. The anticipated outcome is to strengthen communication and understanding of environmental health procedures along the border. Organized by environmental media and geographical jurisdiction, the Environmental Health Yellow Pages catalogs U.S. governmental agencies (federal, state, county, and city) that deal with the specific topic of interest (e.g., Underground Storage Tanks, Foodborne Illness, etc.). As best as possible, the directory identifies the closest agency with jurisdiction over a given environmental or health issue. To facilitate its sustainability and ensure the information remains current, the Environmental Health Yellow Pages is NOT intended to be person specific.

The Yellow Pages may serve a wide array of individuals for various purposes. Local sanitarians may use it to learn how an environmental situation is handled in another locale. District Health Officers could use the directory to notify the appropriate jurisdictions of pending environmental health issues. Local, State and Federal policy and regulation decision makers could use it to inquire about laws and regulations in effect in similar jurisdictions. Epidemiologists could use it to find the agency that has data on a specific media issue. Residents in border communities could use the Environmental Health Yellow Pages to inform the appropriate agency of environmental problems in their neighborhood. With the goal of improving communication and understanding between environmental and health officials and the border communities, this document should be used to compliment existing procedures for environmental and health alerts. It is not a substitute for official notification procedures.

The Environmental Health Yellow Pages presents a first step in identifying the various agencies in the different states that manage specific environmental matters. In addition, it lends insight into how the different state health and environmental agencies are jurisdictionally structured. Understanding agency structures helps determine what agencies need to be involved in the decision making process regarding border environmental health issues. Consequently, this document may aid in the identification of which agencies should be included in such discussions. When expansion of this project to the other side of the border is considered, this understanding becomes even more valuable, if not critical.

This Spring 1999 edition of the Environmental Health Yellow Pages represents a collaboration of the four U.S. border states with the expectation that binational work will begin with Mexico in the near future.

A simple process was used to create the document. To eliminate any confusion in understanding the structural differences between State and local environmental health agencies along the border, the Yellow Pages directory was developed by a small team of State environmental and health workers from the four U.S. Border States, and led by the New Mexico Environmental Department (NMED). The team developed a list of possible environmental incidents that are dealt with in the environmental health arena. The list was organized into general categories by media type. Subcategories were added to reflect different types of incidents associated with that media.

The NMED created a database based upon the categories and subcategories to facilitate data collection. The team agreed upon the data fields that would be filled out by each state. Graduate students compiled the data and submitted it weekly to the NMED where all data was assembled into one document. The data were then organized into the actual Environmental Health Yellow Pages. The first draft was passed out to the group for comments which were returned to the NMED, who incorporated the suggestions where appropriate.

By its nature, the Environmental Health Yellow Pages is, and must continue to be, a living document. It will require annual updating and changing as the border region evolves. Comments and suggestions may be sent to the New Mexico Environment Department.
